Hey,

I've been thinking about something that happened this week, and after much thought I feel that I need to talk about it, even though it's an uncomfortable topic.

This week in the kitchen, there was a conversation about racial preferences and dating black men. I didn't want to make things awkward at the time so I went along with it. Some (though not all) parts of that conversation were hurtful to me.

I know your comments didn't come from a malicious place. Also, you're obviously entitled to have your opinions about racial preferences. But voicing them out loud in a casual manner in come from a malicious place. Also, you're obviously entitled to have your opinions about racial preferences. But voicing them out loud in a casual manner in front of a black colleague was really hurtful to me and not okay. I would just ask that you please be more sensitive and mindful about how making comments of that nature may make others feel.

It wasn't easy for me to address the above, but it affected me deeply. I absolutely know you weren't trying to offend me. I simply ask that in the future, you exercise discretion when speaking out loud about sensitive subjects in the workplace.

Thank you,

Sophie
