Case studies

Case background	The Chubb advantage
A lead actress sustained ankle injuries as a direct result of physical training she was undertaking to perform her role. Principal photography was interrupted for a number of weeks whilst she recovered enough to complete the majority of missing scenes.	Chubb paid the incurred costs for the rescheduling of missing scenes and other expenses incurred by the production as they tried to work around her injuries which persisted throughout - including script re-writes and physiotherapist costs.
A production were filming on location in Botswana. Whilst a group of monkeys were swinging in the trees above the filming equipment, a branch broke and monkey fell onto a camera beneath, severely damaging it.	Chubb paid for the cost of repair to the camera and also for the extra expenses arising from the delay caused to the filming schedule as a result of the time it took to deliver the replacement camera to the remote filming location.
A product to be featured in an advertising campaign was delayed in transit from China due to a fire on the ship that was transporting it.	The product wasn't damaged, but it was delayed in arriving on set by a number of days. The production had to re-schedule filming and Chubb paid the costs associated with this.
A commercial was being filmed at night in the Mojave desert, North America. When the lights were turned on for filming, swarms of insects were attracted to them interrupting the shoot by a couple of days.	Unusual weather conditions in the form of a second rain season had caused a second breeding season. Chubb agreed these were exceptional circumstances and the claim was settled under the Extra Expense section.
