

Organisations may need to move their people to ensure their safety in the face of natural catastrophes, conflicts, political violence, riots or health emergencies. These events can also be accompanied by a range of complexities and concerns often requiring additional specialist support.

AIG's evacuation policy gives clients peace of mind at a time when they need it, operating across three critical phases of evacuation.

SHELTER IN PLACE – Support when it is not necessary to move, or it is safer to remain in the location.

INVACUATION – A movement of people to a safer location within the same country.

EVACUATION – The situation has deteriorated to such an extent that the advice is to leave the country.

Each evacuation response requires its own individual considerations including:

YOUR PEOPLE: What is the profile of the people that need to be moved? e.g. employees, contractors, families? Other members of the community? Local people and expats? Will they require visas or other eligible documentation?

YOUR ASSETS: Can physical assets be secured? Can data and other material be secured or moved? Is there any equipment that may be of use to forces in the event of a conflict? Are any assets likely to be destroyed?

PERSONNEL WELFARE AND DUTY OF CARE:

What mode of transport will be used to move people? Where can they go? What about short-term and long-term accommodation, food, clothing, physical and mental health?

BUSINESS NEEDS: What is the impact to brand and reputation? What crisis management resources are required? What are the financial considerations? What is the impact on other regional business operations? Are there effective return to work plans? Is Legal and communications advice needed?
